

the authority to stop him from spending his money as he pleases. But with sound guidance and advice, his options would be fair and clear and then he could carry the responsibility of his choice, the same way one holds a pack of cigarettes and gets annoyed by the cancer warnings printed on it. The question here, who will play this important awakening role? Can the government do it? I don't believe so. Let it first succeed in implementing the smoking ban law!

So what do you think about establishing a union for the poor consumers which would defend their interests and become as good as the Real Estate Union that defends the owners of buildings, three quarters of which are in bad condition and violate the law? Of course, the union of the poor will never come to light because it is protecting the poor and the helpless. But I think that the press can have the leading role in raising awareness and preserving those rights. Yes, the press and the pen. I hope that newspapers will expand to cover all kinds of activities related to the livelihood and rights of the citizens and residents from the perspective of the simple consumer, even if the figures were not really accurate or the statement was little far from reality.

And whoever gets upset, let it be.
