

incident occurred, what would happen? I believe the answer for the reader is pretty obvious.

While observing the passengers who gathered for the onward flight to Toronto, it struck me that they were an exquisite mixture of different nationalities and religions, holding nothing in common with each other except a Canadian passport. I found myself wondering, how could those people adapt their loyalty to both their new and home countries? How could all these different religions and cultures live together under the common umbrella of Canadian citizenship, which acknowledges their dual citizenships and protects the freedom of their different beliefs and religions? Although I was the one asking myself these questions, I already knew the answer. What makes this possible is the strict application of law to everyone within a cultural framework of justice and equality. Despite the official languages of Canada being English and French, the prevailing languages are the mother tongues of her people. The languages seen on the shop fronts change from street to street, from Arabic, to Persian, to Hindi, and to Chinese. Everyone uses his mother tongue when communicating with his own people, and switches to English or French when speaking with others. At first glance, you may feel these people could never connect culturally or intellectually, but somehow they are coexisting. This takes us back to our own ideologically and culturally diverse society. The only thing common among all Canadians is respect for order and law. Among Kuwaitis, it is the wide net of generations of love, uniting us under our ruling family.

If all Kuwaitis applied the law as much as the Canadians, we would be the very best nation.