

right to hear the views of both parties, so find in yourself that same rhetorical power so the people can distinguish between right and wrong.

On the other hand, although the reforms in the document are logical, it hasn't touched upon how to deal with some of the government employees who don't do their jobs well, if they even show up to work at all. Moreover, it didn't address removing the corruption which has already spread in the institutions' joints, or how to raise the performance standards of the government. Just take the municipality and the Ministry of Electricity as an example. Don't forget the issue of health and treatment abroad. So, before increasing the price of electricity and gasoline and imposing taxes on companies, it is better for the government to tune the work rhythm of the ministries, which only need a little bit of control and strict monitoring. A very easy task, and I have no idea why you don't do it.

At the same time, when will we put an end to the “Special Favors Department” through which our “public servants” are able to reach the National Assembly? All of the above, our dear minister, should be in the preface and the first bullet of the reform document.
