

comment the Muslim man made related to baptism. The English man addressed the public, crying out that this was a Christian land and nothing and nobody, no matter who, has the right to assault Christianity. In the middle of all the yelling between the two, I noticed the presence of three policemen and none of them intervened to speak or tried to take sides.

After the mutual yelling, the English man went on his way and the Muslims continued their presentation.

The question is: First, if a Christian came to Kuwait, put a table in Mubarkiyah, started preaching and inviting people to Christianity, what do you expect will happen to him?! Second, despite all that fighting, nobody raised his hand to hit the other and neither violated the law, yet in Kuwait someone can be murdered over a khazza—a Kuwaiti word for an insulting look. Even with all the heightened security, a stabbing carried out by a Somali man, and constant threats from ISIS; the police acted professionally, with great caution and readiness, without engaging in a conflict that didn't exceed the rights to freedom of expression. The onlookers also accepted what the young Muslims were doing, and didn't tell them take your table and go to Edgar Road for instance.

Indeed, Britain with its laws deserves the title of Great.