

of “Humanitarian Leader.” Whichever land cries out in distress, you will find Kuwait the first to answer. Although charitable work stems from the humanitarian spirit of individuals, it remains in practice the work of institutions. In order to ensure the delivery of good to its rightful beneficiaries, in a way that contributes to real and sustainable development of individuals, families, communities, the institutions of charitable work must be developed and re-engineered. This development has been and remains one of my most important goals to achieve through the charity fund of my father, Abdullah Abdullatif Al-Othman.
