

minors as it was intended. This institution acts as the voice of the minor when defending his rights, but if this voice should weaken, would the minor be able to call out for his rights on his own? I have written this series of articles not as an outsider's evaluation of the institution, but my writings were inspired by my long personal experience with the Public Authority of Minors' Affairs; first as a minor myself, and until this day, as a trustee on the charity fund of my father, may God have mercy on him.
