

Allow me to babble for a bit, and I mean no disrespect to the Ministry of Interior, because we would also like to resolve the family visa matter, but there are many expatriate employees with a great financial capacity, as well as law-abiding people who are hosting their parents in the country. On the other hand, there are those who can't even afford to rent an apartment, but you find out that he brought a large number of his relatives for employment, and unfortunately there are those who host their relatives during Ramadan for the sake of collecting money at the mosques. The point is, it is unreasonable to circulate decisions that may be inhumane on all the parties, and which will not help in solving the demographics issue. Those who are able and honest are going to send their families back home, but the other will turn to the residency merchants who would not turn away anyone who would be dependent upon him. As a result, the trade of humans and residencies will flourish, and we neither extinguished the evil nor became any better. I am going to say it again, if you want to fix the demographics, you have to eliminate the residency merchants first. Otherwise, you can just forget about it. What will eventually happen, is that the committed and capable people, those who bring value and have a positive impact on the country's economy, will leave. What will remain are those who you call the marginal labor, and those who are willing and able to bend the law. If you would like to make sure, at the end of the three months' notice, conduct a statistical study and see for yourself who left and who rectified his status and how.

You will be surprised by the result.
