

public library to the healthcare facility project, which could act as the final depository for his books and manuscripts that they might benefit both scholars and the public. As it is a project of science and education, I found no difficulty in convincing the charitable fund's managing partners to include funds for establishing the library. As a result, the library of the late Abdullah Al Othman was also opened in Luxor. Here the necessity must be made clear for our young new scholars that the physical and secular sciences must be used to combine and fill the voids between religion and the reality of life. It is within these gaps that the likes of "ISIS" and its siblings thrive, resulting in abominable sectarian extremism.

I return back to his Eminence, our Sheikh. The most beautiful thing I have heard from him was his desire to continue in charity and teaching the youth all the knowledge that God has bestowed upon him even after retiring from his position. This man's whole life is about giving and I hope others will follow the example of this man; setting a clear plan for their retirement in which they give what they have of their knowledge to the next generation. This is a valuable insight for anyone who is only a steward of their position.

In conclusion, may God bless you, our kind Sheikh. I want to remind you of your promise to visit me when you come to Kuwait and a promise is a promise. We will always be with you, walking together on the path of good. May long life be yours and our dear readers'.
