

I swear, it is not fair! Only 7 thousand dinars spent on the minors, and the rest on the employees?! At least split it in half, one half for the employees and the other for the minors! At least then it might seem more reasonable!

I also wonder, do all the Authority's employees benefit equally from this treasure of Ali Baba as a reward and appreciation for their efforts, or are these bonuses selective and dependent upon someone's mood? Are there any regulations that organize these types of expenditures? The answer, which is frequently noted in the State Audit Bureau's report, strikes as a lightning: there are not regulations! Does it seem logical that for two whole decades, PAMA hasn't found time to standardize its disbursement of bonuses? Or is it only important to impose regulations when it comes to spending on the poor orphans?! As a reminder, the Board of Directors bears just as much responsibility as the administration. And isn't it just lovely that the Board of Directors reportedly petitioned for an amendment to this law, requesting authorization to deduct another 10% off the profits of those poor people? Khosh! Amazing!

(Khosh means "great," or "wonderful." The context of "Khosh!" at the end of this article carries a tone of sarcasm.)
