It gives him an empty feeling of satisfaction that something has been accomplished, but it kills the desire to achieve higher things in this life and the hereafter. He just settles with spinning, and twirling, and begging help from people. It is here that nations collapse and countries weaken, becoming prey to the greedy.

The funny thing is, however, that this belief is embodied in the administrative systems followed by the ministries. The documentation process in any ministry makes the citizen and the employee circle in an endless orbit. We find the decision makers attempting to stop the spinning by resorting to the shortest route. For them, the solution is to form committees filled with members who have no real authority at all. Each committee is headed by its chief, and if he's any good, the committee might succeed. Otherwise, the members meet to spin in circles as did Rumi's dervishes. In the end, each one returns to his home, light-headed and satisfied with all the benefits he's received, but without having accomplished anything. Hence, the rights of the people are lost and the years go by, while everyone is waiting for the dervishes of the twenty first century to take off their skirts.
